NORDIC POLE PARAMETER

SWINGWEIGHT [kgm<sup>2</sup>]

The swingweight refers to the pendulum motion of a pole. The more weight near the tip of the pole, the more energy the skier has to spend. Ski poles are tested for swingweight performance without a grip, strap, and basket. The lower the swingweight, the better.

BALANCE POINT [mm]

This measurement is taken from the top of the pole and describes the point where the pole is in equilibrium. It is measured without grip and basket using a shaft length of 1350mm. The higher the center of gravity, the better.

BREAKING LOAD [N]

An essential mechanical value that describes the breakage resistance of a pole in the event of external forces. It is an indicator of durability. To test breaking load measurements are taken at two different points along the shaft, a force is then applied to the middle part of each section until the pole fails. These two values are then averaged to give the breaking load. The higher the breaking load, the better.

STIFFNESS [mm]

This factor determines the efficiency of the force transmission during propulsion. A stiffer pole transmits more of the skier's energy, and the less is absorbed by flex in the pole. Stiffness is measured without grip and basket. A force is applied at two different points directly in the middle of each section, and the maximum deflection is measured. These two values are then averaged to give the stiffness. The stiffer the shaft, the better.

WEIGHT [g/m]

Pole shaft weight is a major determining factor in the overall performance of a ski pole. It is a measurement of the total weight of the pole shaft per meter without grip and basket. The material used in construction significantly influences this number. The lower the weight, the better.
